The Public Philosophy Journal (PPJ) is an open forum for the curation and creation of accessible scholarship that deepens our understanding of, deliberation about, and action concerning issues of public relevance. Unlike traditional scholarly journals, the PPJ has adopted a unique Formative Peer Review process, which enables colleagues working in academic and non-academic arenas alike to create relevant, accessible scholarship in mutual collaboration.

Our model of scholarly publishing establishes partnerships with publicly engaged individuals and organizations to facilitate publications that enrich public life. Rather than simply bringing the traditional scholarly journal online and providing public access to its contents, the PPJ cultivates habits of enriching scholarly development — for people, communities, and ideas — to make our shared efforts more effective and to create publics capable of responding in imaginative ways to the great challenges of our time.

Get involved in the PPJ community:

- Submit original work for Formative Peer Review and potential publication in the Journal
- Curate content to The Current
- Read, discuss, and share publications in the Journal and content on The Current
- Serve as a Formative Peer Reviewer or Coordinator
- Deepen and expand the impact of publicly relevant initiatives
