Brass bands in Africa – a brief introduction to a continent-wide topic

Gavin Holman, February 2020

Brass bands in Africa have been in existence since the 19th century after the various colonial powers had established their presence across the continent. Some were directly associated with the ruling authorities – e.g. military and police bands – others were established in communities or were associated with various missions and church establishments. They tended to be either “white” or native African in their make-up, with very little mixing between them – as often was the case in the wider community.

The history of such bands is very sketchy and limited, and the small amount of information I have collected so far is presented here. I hope that future researchers will be able to open up much more of this hidden history – as the original colonial explorers “opened up” the continent – in addition to exploring the wealth of bands that are currently flourishing in all the countries of the continent, from the military bands of Egypt to the church brass choirs of South Africa.

As with all early bands, their instrumentation was varied and often depended on what instruments were available to the players. The Moravian band movement in South Africa dates back to the late 19th century and bands were originally modelled on the British style brass band. After WW2 there was an increasing influence from the “Posaunenchor” bands in Germany and the Moravian bands became more like an extended brass ensemble.

The range of types of bands in Africa mirrors that elsewhere in the world, with the western-style brass and concert bands, marching and bugle bands, drum and fife bands and various type of ensemble. Some of these relate directly to earlier colonial era bands or band-types, others have flourished in the years since the various countries gained independence and forged their own styles – of instrumentation and music.

Here is a list of some bands, past and present, together with a sample of pictures of bands, and a bibliography of books, articles and theses.
