WHAT IS DIGITAL MEDIEVALIST?
Digital Medievalist is an international, interest-based virtual research community with a broad thematic focus that networks researchers and scholars of different status groups to jointly expand the scope of the individual disciplines. The community was founded in 2003 and has published research through the open access journal of the same name since 2005. Regardless of location, the Digital Medievalist community offers a network for established scholars as well as for those just beginning their academic career. Digital Medievalist is open to all interested parties, independent of existing experience in the digital humanities or medieval disciplines, from absolute newcomers to so-called pioneers and senior scholars in the field of (digital) medieval studies.

WHAT'S NEXT:
The Postgraduate Subcommittee evaluates various initiatives of the Digital Medievalist community on an ongoing basis and works to promote networking within DH studies in general. In particular, we are working to outline the planned activities of the newly founded Postgraduate Subcommittee – organization of joint panels (ICMS Kalamazoo, IMC Leeds, MAA), production of podcasts, general social media presence – and promote a peer-to-peer exchange. Increasing the visibility of these infrastructures should also initiate conversations on interdisciplinary work, necessary skills, and the need to reform university curricula in the medieval context and thus contribute to an overarching perspective towards current debates on the profiling of disciplines in the humanities between traditional and innovative/alternative requirements.

Got panels, publications, and podcasts? We do!
