Quite consistently with his common sense training, Erasmus of Rotterdam was vastly disqualified when time came to dispute with Luther. The Dutch scholar reproached the German reformer that all his deliveries on Christian Faith "were no more than mere declamations", to which Luther replied unhesitant that The Spirit of Christianity is declamatory in nature and nothing else. Terrified by the none-logic Luther's statements, the altar-boy from Louvain did not dare to deal with the Reformer never again. To be fair, not even Germans' mentality was endowed for such a radical approach to the message of Salvation as Luther did.

Humbly,

Your mean, base, useless servant,

il signore Pecorelli, tuttolojo e pittore molto rumoroso.

The Bondage of the Will, Martin Luther.
